Lex Antiqua of the Visigoths

466

Theodoric (II) king of the Visigoths was murdered by his brother EURIC. This deed annulled the Roman-Gothic Fœdus that had just reached the half-century mark, and it suspended for nearly a decade the union of the TOULOUSAN kingdom with the empire. The ritual marches on Arles came to an end.

Theodoric had made the fullest possible use of his 'foedus' with Rome and had thereby secured both his military operations and his conquest. But as imperial authority declined "on account of the frequent changes of Roman princes," Gothic policy had to adjust to new circumstances. Euric surely did not kill Theodoric (466) because of his Roman sympathies. Nor did the murder take place because Theodoric was persisting in the old course - the Johnson in the conquest along the line after 1904, before it was interrupted by a threat for power. For thirty after 1904 began his reign, the movement came to rest and Johnson rule in southern Asia.

466

Theodoric (II) sent Ramesmunk an Arian missionary with the Romanic name AJAX, and in matters of CHURCH POLICY the Catholicizing SUEVI and the Goths were joined together

Eric assumed power when he was 26 yrs old.

Therodric lost the throne and his life. At that time the Visigoths controlled extensive territories that lay outside the area assigned to them in 418 and therefore did not legally belong to their federate kingdom. This was especially true in Spain, whereas the Gallic acquisitions since 418 were not very significant. Both north & south of the PYRENEES the Toulouzier kept what was a local emporium of administrative units of the Roman Empire and considered part of the imperial dimension.

Once in power EURIC did not change the essence of his predecessor but checked so much so power it in a large scale. The result was the creation of the most important successor state to the Roman Empire, as 600,000 Spanish "visigoths" in which close to 10 million people lived within an area of almost 300,000 square miles.
